Fudojin Temple

Fudojin was a temple built on the edge of the Agatsuma River. According to the historical record, "When I, the chief priest, was sick due to the consecutive eruptions happening daily and was resting in the back of the warehouse, I felt a loud noise and shaking. Looking at the back, the mudflow was approaching. I ran out, not having enough time to take out the precious Buddhist valuables, and at that moment, the temple was swept away. When I ran up the road desperately, the Kannon-do collapsed. I was breathless and ran away, and when I noticed, I was about 3.6m above the mud stream. " The chief priest saved his life.
